THE SECURITY INTELLIGENCE COMPANY

The CISO: your central point of contact for managing your information and data security

A CISO (Chief Information Security Officer) is responsible for managing a company's information and data security risks and plays a central role between business, processes and technology. Their primary tasks include establishing a management framework for security measures and monitoring their implementation and compliance. They develop and oversee the company's information security strategy, carry out risk assessments and establish security policies and processes. The CISO provides technical and organisational support to senior management in fulfilling legal obligations (e.g. under NIS-2). They also coordinate incident management, audits and awareness training. A CISO therefore also shares responsibility for general corporate security, which includes the company's employees and facilities.

Why does a company need a CISO?

Companies are increasingly recognising the importance of employing a security officer, as robust security processes and mechanisms are essential to ensuring business continuity. Asset protection and security risk and incident management are the pillars of a reliable security architecture.

Why is a CISO important for a company?

A CISO is responsible for the strategic and operational security of a company's information and IT systems and is important for several reasons:

- Protecting sensitive data is essential for companies, as data breaches or theft of intellectual property can lead to significant financial losses.
- Proactively identifying and resolving security risks as part of risk minimisation reduces downtime and costs.
- In terms of regulatory compliance, correctly implementing compliance requirements prevents heavy fines and legal risks.
- Effective incident management and the implementation of disaster recovery strategies minimise disruptions and ensure business continuity.
- Fast, transparent responses to cyber incidents strengthen the trust of customers, partners and investors, thereby protecting a company's reputation.

CISO-as-a-Service

Finding an experienced, well-qualified CISO in today's competitive information security job market is very difficult, time-consuming and costly. CISO-as-a-Service can therefore be an attractive solution for companies.

In a CISO-as-a-Service solution, an external strategic cybersecurity consultant works for a company either on-site or remotely. With CISO-as-a-Service, companies primarily outsource their cybersecurity responsibilities and tasks to a highly qualified specialist with the necessary experience and expertise.

CISO-as-a-Service: Our Approach

In today's world, the security landscape has evolved, with constant changes in cyber threats and the regulatory environment. The CISO has therefore become an important player in the management of security services without having to fill a full-time CISO position internally. In addition, a CISO takes on tasks for you that go far beyond those of a full-time employee.
